"This is a major turning point for digital photography," says Bryan Lufkin, design director at Adobe, who also explains the strategy behind the move. "We've long been able to remove the barrier of the screen because Photoshop has inspired so many people to become artists. Now, as a service, Photoshop will show us the best way to edit a photo; whether it's on a smartphone, computer, tablet or in the cloud." Explains today's announcement, "We are creating a new experience for people who dream of being creatives, and a new experience for power users who need the most out of Photoshop. Photoshop for Content Creation will be deeply integrated into the web like Photoshop today, while Photoshop on the web will function as a service that delivers the most capabilities possible to further elevate Adobe's market place position to compete against the industry's oldest and most iconic image editing solutions. We are ramping up the number of people who can access this service to join the Photoshop family, as well as the number of people who can create in this service on the web. We will invest further resources in this effort to bring this new Photoshop experience to more people.” With these new Photoshop features, Adobe is driving innovation across the entire photo editing workflow - from creation to delivery. Its goal is to unify the image editing and publishing process by bringing the experience out of the browser and back to the desktop, all while making it faster and easier to use.

The new foreground and background dropdowns are a quick and easy way to change your selection. Quickly select a piece of your image and click one of the new updated dropdowns to choose a different background or foreground color. Simply click the arrow next to the dropdown and select a new color. This feature allows you to do just that. By default, every single Photoshop document is saved with a default workspace. This is very useful if you're working on a big project and have lots of different workflows across multiple layers, but if you want to tidy up your workspace, you can easily reorder or hide the layers inside your current workspace. It does not, however, equal "real" areas. The reason being that they can be created with a pixel or point range, and they don't have any practical use before you go into fine-tune mode. That said, it helps you visualize how everything inside the workspace will look before you import it and start making your changes. A selection that is made with the new selection tool window is made permanent when you select the "Lock Portrait" option. This means that the selection tool window is permanently locked to your document, and you can't accidentally make a selection or copy it outside of the tool window. The new Auto-Blend function can automatically take composite images and convert them into single image files. This basically means that the images can be merged together and saved in a single file that is more manageable. To do so, select the file you want to save and click the "File > Save" button. Choose "Blend to One Image" and you're all set.
