One of the things I always liked about Lightroom is how well it displays JPEG previews. And it looks like Adobe has done away with JPEG previews and gone to DNGs. Ok, previews work ok in the "Develop" version, but in the "Web" version it's slower and doesn't show any preview at all. Looking at the "Develop" version now it's very visible why they went to DNGs. Plus they seem to be using a lot of memory. When you individuallly select an image for work, at least 2 of the images I selected, you get a smart preview. Ok, the "Develop" version uses resources but the editing is much faster. The "Web" version uses even more resources. Still, it doesn't have the same interaction. For example the smart preview is available in the "Developer" version and in the "Develop" version so you can see what you're doing. Then in the "Web" version it's a little slower. Well, that's it for me. While editing a show, I used 4K resolution and 24 fps (fps = frames per second) due to space and size restrictions of the venue, but with a little AI magic (e.g., post-processing with presets), the same footage looks fantastic at 720p and even 1080p, thanks to Adobe's NativeCode feature. Breaking news: I tried it, and it worked! Video editing with Premiere is easy and straightforward. Point, shoot, edit, and render. On the newest versions of the software, you can designate image files for scaling on a layer, which will provide you with a choice between adjusting the luminance, color, and secondary curves with a single control. You can also designate images for sharpness and detail, and these will be inserted after chroma (color), luminance, and curves have been applied.
