Electrospray ionization (ESI) is increasingly used for high-resolution mass spectrometry (HRMS) of biological macromolecules, and its application to small molecules is now emerging. In this paper, we report that the ESI-HRMS technique is more sensitive than MS/MS, as it is possible to detect structures with as little as 0.5-10 amol, mainly because of the high-resolution capabilities. This is confirmed by the detection of a specific site of an average peptide digested from a polyribosome complex, and by the characterization of a few natural products, using label-free ESI-HRMS. Specific details on how to characterize and discriminate a small molecule mixture using an electrospray source, in the presence of an ionization suppressing species, are herein reported and discussed.Our long-term goal is to understand the molecular mechanisms that regulate the conformation, stability and subcellular localization of proteins. Our current focus is on the small G-protein, ADP-ribosylation factor (Arf), and the mechanisms that regulate the intrinsic conformational changes that lead to GTP binding and hydrolysis. We have made progress toward solving the crystal structure of the cysteine-free, ADP-ribosylated form of Arf from bovine brain, using a combination of the MAD (Multiple Wavelength Anomalous Dispersion) method and molecular replacement. Furthermore, we have used mutagenesis, molecular modeling, and biochemical analysis of Arf and its functional mutants to provide the first mechanistic model for GTP activation of Arf. We have discovered novel
